OAHU CONTROL OF THE LEGISLATURE

The following is from the Hilo Tribune:

The matter of reapportionment of various districts in Hawaii by the legislature is certain to come up again next spring. Last time the proposition was defeated by the members from the outside islands, who objected to a plan which would have the effect of adding to the strength of Oahu in the legislature. That reason for opposition is stronger now than it was before, and Hawaii, Maui and Kauai may be expected to continue to object to the apportionment. If the three islands stand together on the proposition they will, of course, be able to defeat it. If they do not, it means that the island of Oahu will have a clear majority in the House of Representatives and will gain another senator. There are fifteen members of the upper house now, and Oahu has six, while she has twelve of the thirty representatives.

It will be remembered that Congress in passing the Organic Act made the present apportionment, and added a provision that after the first election, the legislature of Hawaii should proceed to make a new apportionment, based upon the population by districts. This the legislature has steadily refused to do, mainly because of the objection of the islands other than Oahu to their loss of power. It is doubtful, to say the least, whether they will ever vote to curtail their own strength in this way. Kauai, for example, would probably lose a Senator if the apportionment were carried out. In fact, with Honolulu's possibilities of growth as a city considered, it is conceivable that a time might come when Kauai, and some other districts might be entitled to no representation at all in the Senate.

It is not likely that Congress intended the apportionment scheme to work out so that one island would have complete control of the Territorial legislature. In fact in making the initial apportionment, Congress gave attention to the district plan as well as to the matter of representation in proportion to population. This is the American way. Little Nevada, with less population than the Territory of Hawaii, has just as many United States Senators as the state of New York.

The reasons against reapportionment are much plainer now than they were before. Honolulu's growth is much faster in population than that of any other part of the Territory. The island of Oahu is now all one city and county. It cannot have been the intention of Congress that the municipality of Honolulu should have a clear majority in the legislature of the Territory.
